University Adds Specialists
In Economics

Specialists in international and labor economics and a Brazilian economist will join The University of Texas faculty this fall.

Assoc. Prof. Harold K. Charlesworth, a Ph.D. graduate of the University of Wisconsin, will teach courses in economics of undeveloped countries and theories of economic development.

Asst. Prof. Raul M. Branco, a native of Vacaria, Brazil, is scheduled to teach Latin American economics.

A third new Economics Department faculty member is Asst. Prof. Vernon M. Briggs Jr., a recent Ph.D. graduate of Michigan State University, who will lecture on labor economic organization.

Dr. Charlesworth has been an economist with the US government for the past 14 years. He left a position as financial and international economist with the Department of Commerce to come to Austin. His earlier government assignments were in the Philippines with the Agency for International Development, in Indonesia with the International Cooperation Administration, and in Washington, D. C., with the Central Intelligence Agency and State Department. He taught three years at the University of Maryland and George Washington University. He has attended the University of Michigan, University of Wisconsin, London School of Economics, and American University.

Dr. Branco completed his undergraduate work at Guanabara University in Rio de Janeiro and was a Fulbright Fellow at McGill University, where he received his doctorate this year. He also held a Canada Council Fellowship for two years while working on his Ph.D., specializing in Brazilian economics.

Dr. Briggs received his bachelor's degree from the University of Maryland, and has been teaching for the past four years at Michigan State University while working on his doctorate.
